The Job of a Building Inspector

Lon Christensen, Assistant Building Official

A building inspector’s job is to be a second set of eyes on construction projects just in case something gets missed from a set of building plans that have been engineered. He or she looks at all sections, pieces and areas of both residential and commercial buildings. Their job is only on the job site; they do not help, not to cause any burden. We watch the building from bottom to top, footing to the roof, to make sure that all concrete, framing, plumbing, mechanical and electrical are placed as designed according to the building’s set of plans, to the engineering, and to minimum building code. A building inspector spends hours and hours studying the Building Code and pays hundreds of dollars to take exams in order to become certified to do inspections. There are a total of eight exams required to become an eight-way certified inspector for residential and commercial construction. After we are certified, we continue to take education classes to keep current on new products and processes and to re-certify every three years. Our Utah State licensing also requires us to keep up with any changes. We are constantly reading and re-reading the code to make sure we are inspecting correctly. During the high peak season of construction, an inspector could walk on most days an average of around ten to fifteen miles. We walk inside and outside, upstairs and downstairs. We are jumping into house excavations to check sub-grade prorammable; climbing a scaffold anywhere from four to sixty feet in the air. When we get to the top we walk on a twelve inch plank that is often shifting and swaying. We are checking the building of buildings and homes are safe. We do this to help contractors give you a better product and peace of mind. We do this to help get emergency response personnel safely to your home or building in case you are in trouble. We do this because we want to, even though most people don’t even know that we do.
